Reflections from the NCJW Opening Event & Fall Meeting

This past November, I had the honor of moderating NCJW GNO's Opening Event & Fall Meeting at Congregation Gates of Prayer. Over 75 community members gathered to learn about one of the most urgent issues of our time: immigration and deportation. Our panel featured leaders whose work touches this issue from different angles – government, legal advocacy, community organizing, and direct support to immigrant families here in Louisiana.

What we heard was sobering.

Immigrant families, asylum seekers, and the advocates who support them are desperately trying to navigate an already complex system that is shifting rapidly. The people suffering the most are those

Leslie Jacobs: Changing Schoolchildren's Lives for the Better

By Gail Naron Chalew

Since her Newman days when she chaired the Philanthropic Club and changed its name to Actions, Leslie Jacobs has been determined to use her “superpowers” – her strategic thinking skills, her tenacity, her willingness to work hard, and her strong sense of mission – to make a positive impact on the New Orleans community.

In honor of her more than forty years of volunteer involvement that dramatically revamped – and improved – the public education system in New Orleans, Leslie will receive the 2026 Hannah G. Solomon Award on Monday, February 2, at the Audubon Tea Room.

After graduating from Cornell, returning to New Orleans to work with her brother Steve in her family's insurance business, and with a new baby, Leslie began to look for ways to become involved in the community. When she toured Laurel, a public elementary school in the Garden District, the opportunity just “sang” to her, and the Rosenthal Agency became a corporate partner. In typical Leslie fashion, the business relationship turned into a true partnership – not a one-way relationship in which the company would simply fund the school's special programs. Instead, Leslie and her brother worked with the school to improve its ability to educate its students.

This partnership laid the groundwork for Leslie's key role in transforming New Orleans' public schools into a system of charter schools that has since become the most improved school district in the nation. What she saw at Laurel were children whose potential was, tragically, not being fulfilled: they were being failed by the system. This experience drove her to serve for three years on the Orleans Parish School Board, which she describes as a time when she “never worked so hard and accomplished so little,” before being appointed by then-Governor Foster to the state board of education (BESE), where she served for twelve years and became the lead architect of New Orleans' reenvisioned education system.

Leslie attributes her ability to create positive change both to her knowledge of how to get the right people in the room and her desire to “be in the room where it happens.” She notes, “My role is providing the connective tissue, to weave things together, to build trust among people. I also am data-driven, and accountability guides nearly every step I take.”

She loves to “solve puzzles” and used this skill to identify the key issue of educational reform, which was “to free individual schools from centralized control and to give each one the autonomy to create its own budget and hire and fire staff,” as Leslie puts it. “Becoming charter schools seemed to be the most effective way to achieve that goal,” she adds.

Noting that a fundamental belief in the power of education is “built into my DNA,” Leslie cites her mother, the first female tenured full professor at Loyola University, as a role model. Her mother also modeled strength in holding to unpopular beliefs: she was a confirmed atheist at a time when that was quite controversial.

In a similar vein, Leslie has been viewed as a contentious public figure but recognizes that anyone who is a changemaker inevitably stirs up controversy and “breaks some eggs.” She has been spat on and accused of profiteering, and her motives and personality have been attacked. She advises, “Anyone who creates real reform has to have a layer of Plexiglas surrounding them. I never read social media, and I do my best to ignore those attacks.”

Her most powerful counterweight to these attacks, however, is her devotion to her mission: “Having students reach their full potential is what sustains me. I know I have changed the trajectory of tens of thousands of young people, who now have better lives because of what I did.”

Although Leslie and her husband, Scott, have always maintained a residence in New Orleans, since 2018 they have returned only for long visits. They are now planning to spend much more time here. One reason for their return is that Leslie's mission has not yet been fulfilled. In a recent email explaining why she is rebooting Educate Now!, the education advocacy organization she founded in 2008, Leslie wrote, “Here we are, twenty years after Katrina with New Orleans' education story still unfolding, and I find there are new issues that need distilling and new information that needs to be disseminated.” Her first issue is to stop the city from diverting tax revenue designated for schools to its own budget.

Certainly, Leslie will continue to use her unique talents and skills to measurably improve the lives of New Orleans' schoolchildren.

who came here seeking safety and stability, who work, raise families, and contribute to our communities. And yet many now fear leaving their homes for work, school, worship, medical appointments, or even groceries.

What we heard from the panelists is even more alarming: people in Louisiana are being detained past legal deadlines, deported despite valid court orders, and held in remote facilities in conditions that defy dignity. Our state now has the second-highest number of immigration detainees in the country.

The room's response made clear that our Jewish community feels the urgency of this moment. Guided by our own history – as immigrants, refugees, and survivors – we understand what it means to be vulnerable in systems of power. From our experience as activists and allies during the Civil Rights Movement, we also know how to show up when it's risky and hard.

We are facing the civil rights challenge of our time. Let's meet this moment together.

Presidential MESSAGE

As we step into a new year, we are reminded of the enduring values that have guided the National Council of Jewish Women for more than a century: compassion, courage, and an unwavering commitment to advancing the well-being of women, children, and families. Each year invites us to recommit ourselves to these principles – but this year, perhaps more than ever, we feel the urgency and the promise of our collective work.

We are so proud of our accomplishments thus far. We began the year working with Together New Orleans to ratify the future of the city platform. This project supports our commitment to improve life for the citizens of New Orleans.

In early November, our opening event was a panel discussion on “Immigration and Deportation & the Impact on Our Community.” Please see Aaron Bloch’s article in this newsletter. We were impressed by the number of attendees who reached out to help the NOLA immigration community.

Our Advocacy Committee continues to fight for the rights of people on many levels. We currently have many challenges to voter registration laws at both federal and state levels. The changes primarily center on new requirements for proof of U.S. citizenship, mail-in voting rules and restrictions on voter registration drives. Since August, non-governmental organizations have been barred from offering voter registration services at USCIS facilities during naturalization ceremonies. For years, this has been a vital part of our outreach under the passionate leadership of Sylvia Finger. The National Council of Jewish Women, Greater New Orleans Section is a plaintiff in a lawsuit that challenges this new policy.

As we embark on this new year, let us carry with us a spirit of hope, a commitment to justice, and a belief in the collective power we hold. Together, we can ensure that the year ahead is not only brighter – but more just, more compassionate, and more connected.

Friendship and Photographs

Gathering at NOMA on October 29, members enjoyed each other's company over lunch followed by docent-led tours of two evocative photography exhibitions: "The View from Here: Women Photographers of the American Landscape" and "Dawoud Bey's Elegy," an exploration of early African American experiences as imagined through historical landscapes. Thank you to Vivian Cahn for arranging this program and to Naomi Kornman, member and docent, for her expertise and insights.

Gardening for Homeless Women and Children

In October, several of us put our sun hats on and got our hands dirty as part of the NCJW Community Service Gardening Project at the New Orleans Women and Children's Shelter. The shelter offers case management, life skills, education, employment assistance and 18 months of post-residential support for homeless parents and their children. Volunteers included Fran Dinehart, Tricia Kirschman, Leslie Rau, Ronda Kottle, Amanda DeLeon, Susan Greenberg and Carol Newman.

Bringing Awareness to Trans Lives

On November 18, in partnership with JPNOLA and Forum for Equality, we co-hosted an educational and equally powerful documentary film screening of "Disclosure: Trans Lives on Screen" followed by a Q&A panel discussion with three prominent local trans activists. The event was well attended, movie snacks were munched and many thoughtful questions were asked of the panelists.

This event was deliberately hosted during Transgender Awareness Week, which seeks to increase understanding of trans community members and issues the community faces, culminating in Transgender Day of Remembrance (November 20), the annual observance that honors the memory of transgender people whose lives have been lost to acts of anti-trans violence each year.

TOGETHER NEW ORLEANS

Together for a Stronger and More Equitable New Orleans

In September, NCJW GNO joined with 1,500 New Orleanians at Xavier University to win commitments from candidates for Mayor and City Council on the Together New Orleans (TNO) People's Platform.

The platform, months in the making, focused on cost of living, public works, jobs and reliable energy. Representing NCJW were TNO board member Barbara Kaplinsky, Robin Goldblum, Kent Box, Gail Chalew, Susan Hess, Diana and Chip Mann, Monique de la Cour, Sylvia Finger, Lilli Geltman Vohs, Susan Greenberg and Gail Pesses.

Two months later, Together New Orleans held a rally and press conference on the steps of City Hall to launch the "People's Transition Team," the next phase in TNO's effort to change our city for the better by working with our elected officials and holding them accountable.

"Our view in Together New Orleans is that we need to organize our civic institutions around a specific platform for change, get commitments from candidates to support that platform and then engage hundreds of leaders from those institutions to work like heck to make that platform a reality," said NCJW's community service liaison Barbara Kaplinsky.

Bushels of Cheer

Board members and officers spent part of their December meeting filling holiday treat bags and making greeting cards for children of the Louisiana Center for Children's Rights. The nonprofit law center helps children caught up in the juvenile justice system so they can thrive in their homes and communities. Ryan Hill, the center's development director, expressed appreciation to the women of NCJW's Greater New Orleans Section for their generosity. "The young people love surprises like these," Hill said. "Just goes to show that a little bit of kindness and love from our community goes a long way."

Celebrating Our Community Service Partners

We were thrilled to celebrate our community service partner unCommon Construction at their new facility in Central City on September 20. The unCommon Campus allows the nonprofit to expand its workforce development programs and provide more opportunities for high school students to gain real-world, work-based learning experience.
